Ecosystem for video game creators

From idea to release — in one place.

Pre-seed · October 2026

Most indie games never ship.

During a jam, teams have deadlines, goals and expert feedback. When it ends, all of it disappears — and the team falls apart.

itch.io jam dataset, 10,807 jams · Nolte et al., CSCW 2020 (team continuation after hackathons) · steps combined, approximate

Jam structure, all the way to release.

Organization

Stages, goals and deadlines for every project — the rhythm a jam gives, without the end date.

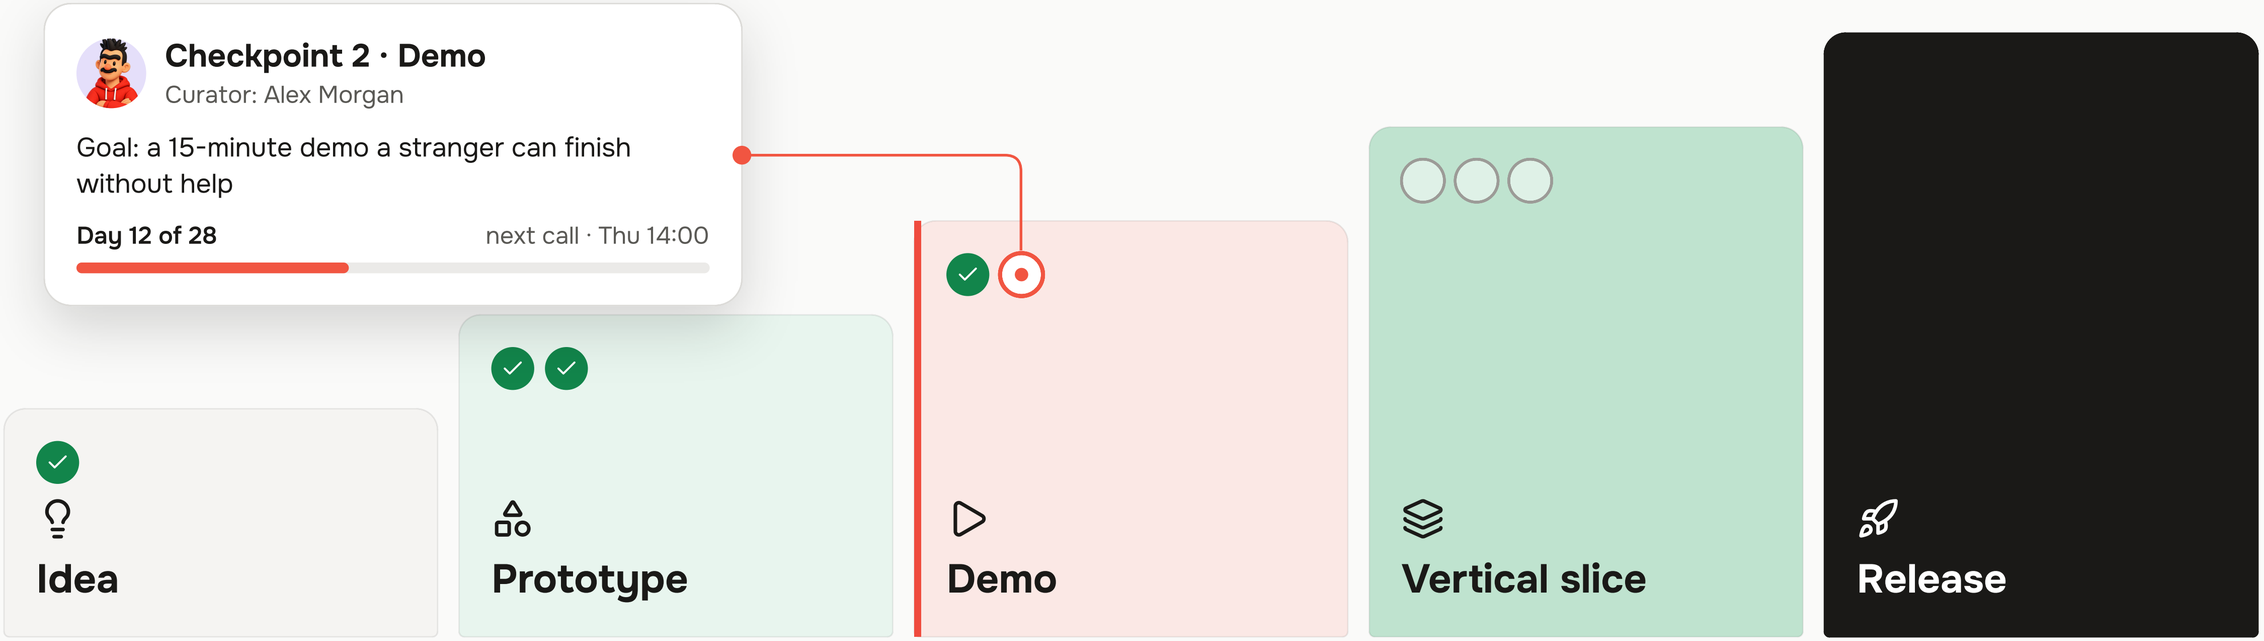

A curator

Feedback that keeps projects moving.

Industry expert
live calls

AI curator
affordable, written reviews

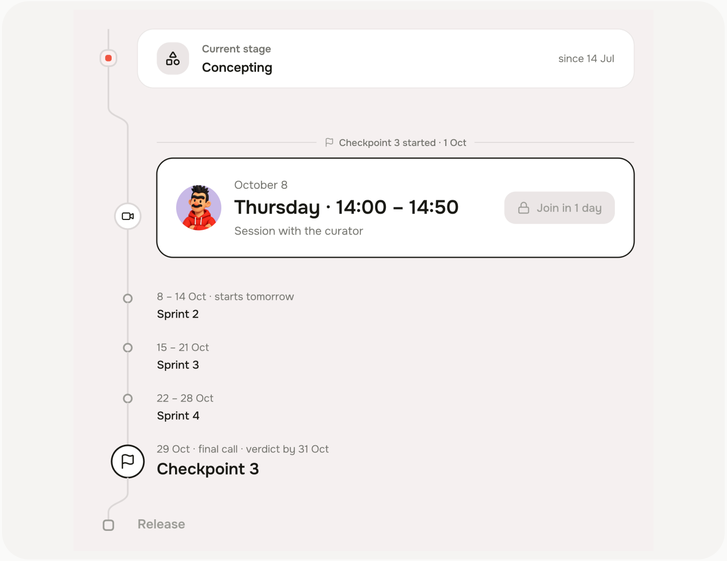

One checkpoint at a time

28 days. One goal. One review.

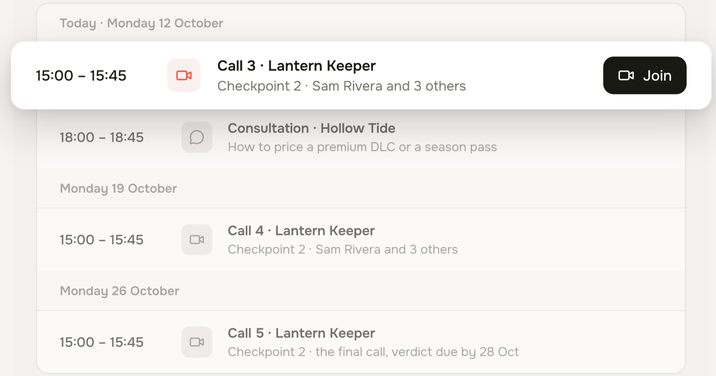

Repeatable — run as many as the project needs

Three spaces. One workflow.

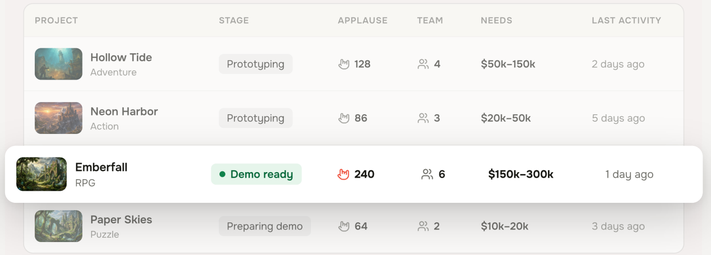

Project space

stages, checkpoints and calls, top to bottom

Advisor space

scheduled calls with teams

Scout space

top projects, their activity and what they need

Checkpoints connect all three: teams work through them, curators guide them, scouts see the results.

Helping indie developers grow since 2015

Dzmitry Drynau

Founder, GDHub

— Co-founded Polygon game-dev school (2015–2021) and the Polygon Games art outsourcing studio

— Ran its in-house incubator (Gamelab): teams of artists and programmers on their own games

— Senior full-stack engineer, 10+ years; built Asteri AI (US) from the first line of code

— Built GDHub himself: platform, AI curator, video calls

How we see game development

Co-development: everyone who helps, shares the result

Contribution point

Each contribution becomes a promise between the author, the platform and the contributor — backed by a co-development agreement: a share of the future game's revenue in exchange for work or money.
